his impetuosity, but, deeming his words only the idle threat of a baffled lover, which would be forgotten as soon as the keen edge of his disappointment should wear off.

A stifled sob from a curtained alcove in the room broke upon her ear; and crossing the floor, she saw a pale form crouching in the embrace, her face buried in her slender, delicate hands, and her whole attitude betokening the abandonment of despair.

"Rain, what are you doing here?"

Claudia Lamoreux lifted her head with the look of a hunted animal at bay; but Claudia was in a complacent mood from having disposed of her importunate lover, and was disposed to be unusually lenient with the strange conduct, in whose veins coursed the hot blood of her Italian father, and whom she was wont to regard with capriciousness, or to ridicule for the wild, foreign ways that were incomprehensible to her.

"There, Rain, be quiet now, and tell me, do you love

Aubrey Hendricks?"

"He is so noble—so beautiful! How can you be so cruel when he loves you?"

Claudia looked down upon her with an amused expression, and then, kneeling, took the flushed face between her palms, while something akin to pity stole into her heart.

"Are you sure that I have not told myself of an intolerable bore in the shape of a too affectionate suitor?"

growled one of the men. "I'd be sorry to be obliged to shut that purty mouth o' your'n; but we don't allow any screeching here."

And Rain, reflecting upon the improbability of any person leaving her, in that sequestered position, thought best not to irritate her caprice. She speculated in vain upon the motive that had led to her abduction, but could come to no satisfactory conclusion; so she wandered when Claudia would think much alarmed, and send in search of her.

The path they were traversing grew more smooth, and she conjectured that they
